

Nevada Senate: Reid Runs Second To Four GOP Opponents

Harry Reid may soon have one more Republican opponent in Nevada's race for the U.S. Senate, and his numbers remain in troublesome territory for an incumbent. Reid, like a number of Democratic Senate incumbents, appears to be suffering from voter unhappiness over the national health care plan and the continuing bad state of the economy.

The latest Rasmussen Reports telephone survey of likely voters in the state finds Reid earning 39% to 41% of the vote against any of four GOP challengers. Still, that's an improvement from last month when he picked up just 36% against his top two opponents. But Reid had 43% support against those two Republicans in December.

Any incumbent who is earning less than 50% at this juncture is considered vulnerable. Reid, who is seeking a fifth term, received 61% of the final vote in 2004.
